Recalling ‘the family picnic’

Tim Cronin / Illinois Golfer

FOCUS OF ACTIVITY The 18th hole of Cog Hill No. 4 in BMW Championship livery after Rees Jones’ renovation. The family picnic was smaller in September.

Phil Kosin coined the nickname, one of the many creative thoughts he had in his too-short time here.

It was a warm July day at the Western Open at Cog Hill, and Kosin was, as was his wont, ruminating while persuing news large and small for Chicagoland Golf. A large gallery was on hand at Cog, which was typical, and while the precise date of his pronouncement was not recorded, the hunch is that many of them on that day were following one Tiger Woods.

“This is the family picnic,” Kosin said. “Ev-

He was right. Everybody did show up. Corporate types trying to not look out of place in a jacket and tie for their half-day in a suite. Hockey guys like Cliff Koroll and Bill Gardner, who gravitated naturally to golf giving the timing of their off season and would find a tree to hang out under near the 17th green. Regulars who would tee it up on No. 2 or No. 3 each Saturday morning, and couldn’t resist seeing how the pros would play Joe Jemsek’s big course. Irregulars – golf is thick with them – claiming they remembered when Billy Casper birdied this hole or that at Medinah and then threw him the ball.

Everybody. Including wanna-bes like Jerry “the Crasher” Berliant, a lawyer convicted for tax evasion in Operation Greylord and then disbarred. He fancied himself a sports fan and celebrity schmoozer of the first order, if he could enter sans ticket – say, by wearing a CBS Sports shirt when that network was the outlet.

Jerry was the kind of guy Bob Arum would recognize during a news conference touting a fight, or that a Pinkerton would spot without a ticket by the 17th green at Augusta National. Both moments, we witnessed.

And Jemsek himself, of course. Pork-pie hat, dark blue blazer, white shirt, striped tie. The very picture of the executive he pretended not to be, greeting one and all with a handshake and a well-worn one-liner while counting the house.

The family picnic was great fun, four exciting days of competitive golf preceded by three days of warmup, including Monday's qualifying round at Village Links – sometimes the most nerve-tingling golf of all, as pretenders and future contenders teed it up in pursuit of one of four spots in the 156-man Western Open field. Make it, and you had a shot at making it big. Miss out, and it's back to the pro shop for another year or to the highway for places unknown.

John Daly made it through the four-spotter once before he was John Daly, then missed the cut. Brian Fogt, a mini-tour specialist, made it through another year and tied for eighth.

The Western at Cog had a different aura to it than the same tournament at Butler National Golf Club, the all-male preserve in Oak Brook. At Butler, the swells hobnobbing was the thing. Regular punters were welcome, but had to take their lunch on the cavernous pavilion tent, where the air conditioning was spotty. And if it rained, well, carp fished from Salt Creek might be on the menu the next day. Almost.

At Cog, the great unwashed were catered to. Certainly, the expense-check crowd had its hideaways, but the rest of us has superior viewing points on Pork Chop Hill – with said delicacy available a few steps away behind the 12th tee – and more shady spots along the sides of Dubsdread's verdant fairways. Some Sundays, more than 50,000 people showed up, far more than the best days at Butler National.

This was a happy surprise to Western Golf Association brass who would never have moved from challenging Butler National – a course designed to host the Western – if not for the Shoal Creek imbroglio of 1990. That meant an end to all-male clubs hosting tournaments on the American tour. Providentially, Jemsek offered Cog Hill, and the public thronged to the site.

But something was lost with the renaming of the Western Open into the BMW and the change in the date to September. Fewer people made the trek to Cog from the north suburbs. Football other pursuits were now in the way compared to the lazy, hazy, crazy days of summer.

The change of venue came about mostly at BMW's request, though it didn't hurt the carmaker's cause that Steve Stricker and Phil Mickelson – the latter having a mad-on against Rees Jones since Jones redid Torrey Pines to Mickelson's disliking – gave the renovation of Dubsdread, designed to attract a U.S. Open, bad reviews. So the WGA left Cog Hill, and, never mind the many charity outings the complex hosts, no outside tournament of significance has been held on the course since.

This week, Conway Farms, on the edge of Lake Forest and a target for BMW's needs, is the venue. Expect good crowds, low scores, and a fat check for the Evans Scholars Foundation.

September's regular issue, featuring on-the-scene coverage of the BMW Championship, the Western Amateur, the Illinois Open, the Illinois PGA and a special report on Doug Ghim's excellent U.S. Amateur adventure, plus the return of our Travel department, will be out shortly after the conclusion of the BMW.

BMW CHAMPIONSHIP PREVIEW

Revved up at Conway

TEXT AND PHOTOGRAPHY BY TIM CRONIN
REPORTING FROM LAKE FOREST

A funny thing has happened on the way to East Lake Golf Club, site of the season-ending Tour Championship, where the $10 million pot o' gold put up by Federal Express will be awarded to the PGA Tour's champion golfer for the 2016-17 season.

Some of the leading players admit that the winning the BMW Championship – this week’s garden party at Conway Farms Golf Club, with $1.575 million going to the champion – just isn’t all that big a deal in the grand scheme of things.

Chick Evans will be spinning in his grave when he finds that ye olde Western Open, which he won in 1910, which used to be a major championship and which benefits the scholarship operation he conceived and carries his name, has sunk in the eyes of some to that of a mere stepping-stone to the next stop for the gray train.

That attitude isn’t necessarily because of the $10 million grand prize at the finish, though that does overshadow this week’s first prize the way a total eclipse overwhelms a mere partial eclipse with the wow factor. It’s because of the structure of the PGA Tour’s elimination system.

Players like Jordan Spieth and Justin Thomas have realized that, if they’re among the top players going into the BMW, they’ll still be among the top five players going into next week, where they’d pick up the jackpot if they win the Tour Championship. (For everyone else, there is too much math involved.)

Spieth, first in the point standings and second in the money, put it this way: “If you’re in a very good position going in and you feel like you’re playing well, the first three can seem like a little more difficult because you see the light at the end of the tunnel. You know that East Lake is really what matters.

“You’re playing at a PGA Tour event

while focused on the next one, which is different than the rest of the season where you’re focused on that event where you’re at. There’s just such a bigger prize at the end.”

In other words, unless Spieth falls on his face walking out the door of the Conway Farms locker room, he’s already in the place he needs to be next week.

Spieth did, at least, say he had “no trouble finding motivation this week because of the way these guys have been playing and how close we are.”

Which is true. Thomas is 27 points behind, and defending BMW champion Dustin

Johnson is 421 back, which can be made up with a victory by the big hitter and poor finishes by Spieth and Thomas. But they will all march on to Atlanta no matter what.

That makes the fight in the middle of the pack for those final spots in next week’s field more noteworthy, if not more important, than the scrap to see who lifts the J.K. Wadley Trophy late on Sunday afternoon. Will Jason Day, Gary Woodland and Jay Haas, who occupy 28th through 30th at the moment, hang on to their places, or will they be supplanted by someone from 31st and below? Mackenzie Hughes, Xander Schauffele and Hudson Swafford, the next three on the list would love to make that happen. And farther down, all the way to Anirban Lahiri, the 70th man, who needs a high finish to get to 30th in the standings.

But the focus will likely be for the title. Thomas, whose victory in Boston was the fifth of the 2016-17 season, ranks as a favorite, as does Johnson, whose return to form was evident by his win in the playoff opener in New York, and Spieth. His win at Royal Birkdale proved he's back on track – some were considering it an off year even though he'd won at Pebble Beach and Hartford.

Then there's Hideki Matsuyama, who triumphed at Firestone to go with two earlier wins and likely is the best player of the moment to have not won a major.

At this point of the season, it's motivation more than mechanics that matters. All the top players are in form. Most all have their minds straight – an exception might be Jason Day, who was on top of the world two years ago when he won the PGA and the BMW and was No. 1 on the planet. This week, he'll have a new caddie, having launched Colin Swatton in favor of chum Luke Reardon. His resume includes working as a roofer and caddying for a buddy of Day's in mini-tour play. Swatton, who has worked with Day since he was 12, will still be his coach.

“Nothing between what he did on the golf course that obviously forced this,” Day said. “Was always thorough and on top of everything. Unfortunately, sometimes the chemistry doesn't work.

“He said, ‘You can yell at me if you want,’ that's how good of a guy he is. I said, ‘No, I can't damage the relationship that we've had together.’

“Unfortunately, sometimes I get in my own way.”

In other words, don't put money on Day this week.

Thomas, whose victory in the PGA Championship last month vaulted him into the forefront of the player of the year race, may be a good selection. Having weathered the storm that was Hurricane Irma – his Jupiter, Fla., house was all but unscathed by the storm, though he took the precaution of taking some valuables, including the Wanamaker Trophy, to Rickie Fowler's house to store in his over-size safe, just in case – he seems completely at ease. And he's scoped out Conway Farms.

“It's short so you can have a lot of birdie looks and a lot of birdie chances if you're driving it well and just like to see how low you can go,” Thomas said.

At Conway, that means 59.

OFF-COURSE ATTRACTIONS The younger set has an autograph area (left) all their own – Matt Kuchar obliged the kids on Tuesday, while TopGolf brought a portable version of their party-on range to Conway Farms, where adults can spank a Spalding for a shot at a major award.

THE FINISH LINE The 18th green at Conway Farms, end of the trail leading to the Tour Championship, will see someone made $1.575 million richer on Sunday..
